

Do I need a Social Security Attorney?

Free initial consultation - nothing to lose!

You have the right to have an attorney represent you in your Social Security disability case. Although you can file your initial application and subsequent appeals for Social Security without the use of an attorney, statistics have shown that claimants represented by an attorney familiar with the Social Security's rules and regulations have an advantage, and have been much more successful. You can rest assured that your interests are being protected when you use an experienced lawyer to work to obtain your benefits. His expertise and knowledge will help navigate through the mounds of paperwork and forms.

In the past we encouraged people to wait until time to request a hearing before contacting us. Things have changed. Social Security is putting a new emphasis on making better decisions at the earlier stages. It is applying the same legal rules used at the hearing stage. This means that a lawyer's help at the early stages may make a big difference.

Do you know what proof Social Security is looking for to approve your claim? A qualified Social Security attorney does. And he knows how to obtain and present that proof. Attorneys like Mr. Christensen have a superior understanding of the way Social Security works and what it is looking for.

Contact our office as soon as possible to coordinate your claim with Social Security and to act as your advocate. The application process for benefits is long and difficult. There are many steps to be completed within specific time frames. Obtaining an attorney early insures you will have everything filed properly and in a timely fashion to meet Social Security's requirements.

The sooner a qualified attorney can begin to work with you and your doctors to develop your evidence, the better.
